Q: C# : When-program-starts and When-does-program-ends property I have a C# winforms application in which I want to get some information from a webserver via C#. The user of the application is supposed to run the application at a fixed time interval. The problem is that when I run the application and the user doesn't want to close it after the time elapsed, the program could still be running in the background. Is there any property similar to the System.Windows.Forms.Application.Idle property which tells the application has ended? A: System.Windows.Forms.Application.ContextIdle seems a bit useful: Gets the idle time for the application context. This value represents the total amount of time since the Windows Forms application started (System.Application.StartupTime) minus the total amount of time the application context was idle (since last time it was entered or exited). Note that ContextIdle is rather meaningless in all but the case where the application has some sort of stateful behavior that requires maintenance (e.g. producing or rendering some sort of graphical output in between idle time). A: If you can do this on a non-critical task just poll the server for a file
