How to Unblock your Computer After C&W or Red Block

When you buy a system that has anti-piracy technology, most retailers offer to give you a "key" to activate the unit. The key is simply a blank code you install on the computer system. Once the system is activated, the retailer will stop selling the system because they no longer need to provide the key. In fact, even if you've bought an original copy of the product and just want to re-program the unit to do something else, you may not be allowed to do so because most retailers don't want blank keys lying around. If you're really lucky, the system you've bought may be locked to a specific name. This means you can't use a blank key to change the name of the product. To get around the difficulty of purchasing an unblocked system, many people resort to using technology available online. It's usually called a C&W or Red Block device, and it's designed to force the retailer to buy back the system from you. In order to use the device, you simply connect the device to your computer and the retailer will receive an alert that your computer is being unblocked. They'll then buy back the system, and you can remove the device and have it for the next person. The C&W/Red Block device consists of two parts. The first part includes a tool to program the device, and the second part is a small piece of hardware that plugs into the computer's USB port. Plug your system into the USB port. The C&W/Red Block device will do the rest. When the device is plugged in, it'll appear as a mass storage device on the computer. The system will need to reboot in order for the device to appear and work correctly. Select "Install Software" from the device's context menu. The software you'll need to install is included on the manufacturer's website. Click "Yes" to install the program, and you'll be presented with a screen asking you to insert the license key you received from the retailer. Insert the license key on the provided software. Choose the language you want to use. It may be necessary to use a language other than English to make the program work correctly.

Open and view the introductory instructions. After loading the software, you'll receive instructions on how to use the device. Plug the device back into the USB port 3da54e8ca3
