The CDATA (Content Decoding and Transfer) data compression format is a simple de-multiplexing and packet reassembly framework for analyzing and reverse engineering message bodies. CDATA is already implemented for HTTP (HTTP/2) and MIME (RFC 2046), but that is not all. Cloudflare has published a library that allows the use of the compressed format for any application; e.g. blockchain, bitcoin, messaging. Google is also implementing this for their VMs on Linux and Windows, so you can expect the new VM statistics to be provided soon. 0x037C is supported As already discussed, this is included as a data format, which means that it requires a specific client that understands it. To accomplish this, Google published a library implementation that will do the magic on your behalf. This implementation is signed and published on GitHub, so if you choose to implement it yourself, please use a tool like Travis CI to ensure that the proper signing keys are included in the repository. Proceeding the efforts of the v0x037c-lib development, a home for a portable version is maintained for Windows and Linux. To add to the effort, a home for a library to decode the CDATA payload was also recently published. 0x037C decoder As a side note, 0x037C was also announced as a standard in ZuluCrypt because it is a lightweight format that can be easily implemented by anyone. This format requires a sequence of 0x37 characters be stored in a JSON array, and
