This article summarizes the literature on the role of family interaction in the etiology and maintenance of anxiety and depressive symptoms among college students. The literature on family interaction and the college student population is reviewed, and methodologic weaknesses of the literature are identified. The article then presents findings from randomized controlled intervention studies that investigated family interaction and treatment outcome among college students. These studies indicate that family interaction is a causal risk factor in the development of anxiety and depressive symptoms among college students. The importance of family processes to the maintenance of symptoms is suggested by cross-sectional studies indicating that family processes mediate the relation between stress, previous psychopathology, and symptom onset in college students. The implications for future research on family processes and the college student population are discussed.0 SHARES Share Tweet Idris Naim, 20, from South Lebanon, has just won the prestigious State Championship of Lebanon this past weekend and is looking to "take over" the world of Skateboarding.
