Basic Guitar Tuner

This handy gadget shows your guitar string's pitch by finding the harmonic and sub harmonic frequencies of the string and automatically reports the string pitch back to you. Although we took a look at the basic (standard) guitar tuner before, that gadget only showed you what a note actually sounded like, without telling you the actual pitch of that note. To make sure you're using the correct pitch, you need to know how much pitch each note is worth in beats per minute (BPM). To find out the difference between harmonics and sub harmonics, I often tell students that you can think of harmonics as the mirror image of sub harmonics on the note's spectrum: So harmonics are found above their sub-harmonic frequencies. When you use the harmonics tab of a string's pitch, you'll find that the pitch of the note is about 100 BPM higher than its exact pitch, as the harmonic tone is an octave above its true pitch. The Sub Harmonics tab however, reveals that the pitch of each note is in fact exactly on par with its exact pitch! The Basic Guitar Tuner sidebar gadget to the right of this page lets you insert a string, turn the unit on or off, and choose between Standard Tuning, Open E tuning, or A tuning. This page shows off the other two tab positions, the Sub Harmonic tab and the Harmonic tab. You will find that the Harmonic tab is displaying frequencies just one octave above the raw pitch of the string. This is because harmonics are placed on the octave that the string is currently played at. So if your guitar is on A tuning and your string is played at 261Hz, the harmonics that will be played will be exactly that pitch, but found one octave higher. The Sub Harmonic tab however is showing pitches that are placed exactly on the string's pitch. While the Sub Harmonic tab shows you exactly where the pitch of the string is placed, it will only show you notes of the exact pitch of the string. While this is great for getting the subharmonic notes just right, it's also great if you want to play the harmonics of a string that is more than a single octave up from where you're playing. In that case, you will be able to listen to the subharmonics of the string that you actually want to play, and
