Rights and Permissions- Introduction.Authors Author Year published Metadata Abstract With the constant flow of new products and technologies, it seems that innovation is never done. To be competitive, companies must reinvent themselves when their current ideas and strategies become obsolete. In order to understand how this process plays out, we collected information about 68 software development companies. We defined a roadmap and divided the companies into 3 groups according to their strategy. This study examines how companies reinvent themselves using an international database of software products. Our findings show that people in software development companies must focus on three broad fields: usage, functionality, and architecture. Companies in the usage field seem to focus on user expertise and user interface. Companies in the functional field focus on product-oriented features and functionality. Companies in the architecture field focus on overall architecture and database design. To attain a sustainable competitive advantage, companies must identify the expertise needed for their
