Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a self-service terminal which enables users to perform the service by himself/herself. 2. Description of the Prior Art In an electronic commerce (e-commerce) transaction, a user, such as a traveler or a customer, may use a self-service terminal (SST) to pay for a service and obtain an information required for the transaction. The SST is commonly used to perform the transaction. A SST may be, for example, a telephone device, a portable computer, a personal digital assistant (PDA), or the like. There are a variety of methods to use the SST. According to one method, a user is required to input account information, such as a credit card number, from an input device of the SST, so as to perform the transaction. According to another method, after a user inputs account information from the input device of the SST, the user may input a command or a secret phrase to a separate password receiving device to complete the transaction. Furthermore, there are more and more electronic service providers (ESP) in the market. The ESP is a service provider who provides e-commerce services, such as a travel agency, a credit company, a computer network, a bank, a finance company, and the like. The services provided by the ESPs are usually through the Internet. The ESPs are in competition with each other, and they may launch their own ESPs, or sell the services of their customers. The ESPs may have their own website through which a user may log into the services and perform the transactions. However, some of the ESPs may provide their service by using the SST to perform the transaction, and the SST may be used by different customers. Thus, it is difficult for the SST to handle a lot of customers.Q: Отправка формы и ввод в форме других ◆
