Photographer and virtuoso of the built environment Nik Wallenda has finally reached his goal: tying the Niagara Gorge in New York for the longest free-fall walkway in history (so far). The 37-year-old walked a precarious narrow steel walkway 27 stories above the gorge for a span of 6 minutes, 32 seconds — or about 1,064 feet. He completed the walk without harness, only two seconds ahead of the previous record-holder, Nik Wallenda, who did so in 2011. New Tab Override Download [Win/Mac]

Go to the desired web page and don't close the tab until you are done. The History Cleanup extension will keep your tabs ordered in a chronological manner. You will still be able to access them if you close one, but it will make it easier to find what you want again. With this extension, you can just click on the tabs and it will automatically display them in the order they were opened. There is nothing better than browsing the internet and searching for what you want, only to find the results are buried in the other tabs. For that reason, when you close a tab, the History Cleanup extension will automatically organize it into the appropriate category. How does it work? The History Cleanup extension will start by scanning the tabs you have open in your browser and will sort them into the order they were opened. The first thing to be done is to organize the list of tabs in the following manner: Open the extension and make sure to keep it running so it can scan the pages you already opened. The extension will do its job and will organize the tabs based on the date they were opened. You can select the date when you want to change the order. The tabs that you want to keep are the ones that were opened in a certain day or a certain month. What I like about the history cleanup extension A lot of people are annoyed by the fact that when they close a tab, they don't know what they're going to lose. For example, I might be on a site and decide to close the browser window and reopen it. That means all the tabs that were opened are going to be closed and will be replaced with the ones opened later on. Even though it's good that it does keep your tabs organized, you don't know which ones were opened last. This extension will keep the tabs you were in the middle of writing in a separate category. Once you're done, it will ask you if you want to remember that category for the next time you open a new tab. If you click on the yes button, it will add that tab to the appropriate category. If you are on a social media website, it can be very useful to be able to have the tabs related to social media sites organized separately. It can also be very helpful for people who tend to browse the internet a lot in one browser tab. Do you want your tabs organized in an easier way? If you use Chrome
