2019 So this is how I use the type name. (emulation is a compile-time option, not a runtime option).
When the type name is not known, code that types the argument gets type inference for free. If you want a sum of two items of different types, you must “cast” one of the items to match the type of the other. A type-aware programming language like Haskell makes this pattern much easier to express, since its type system allows you to program in the types of your variables at the same time as their values. If the first argument is a function, any bound variables in the function body are implicitly written with the appropriate type. This makes parametricity work. A: mytype is clearly not an actual type name, it is the type returned by the infer function (your code did not provide a type signature so infer assumes this value as the return type) -- it is not parsed by the interpreter as a type name, and it certainly could not be used as a function type in a call to make. A: No it can not. The type "is" is not a type name. If the compiler knows it, it is in the type of a primitive type, such as Int or Char. It does not mean that the type name (which is something else) is called "is". Of course, a type name can be used as the type of a function, as long as no function type has any parameter or return type that is known to be not equal to the type name (that is, parameter types are always equal, and return types are never equal, to the type name). A: I would like to make a Type Name. I think that names are nice and compact as identifiers. Use a language with type inference. Your language has a concept of types, but it doesn't use them in much. Your "Type Name" is what the compiler uses to describe the type. Les Misérables - soundtrack A BBC spokeswoman said: "It's a shame that some people are not looking at the trailer for any other reason than to have a go at people. Les Misérables is one of the UK's best known musicals and it's a hit with audiences across the country." The stage show was headed by Sonia Friedman, Steve Whiteman and Simon Shaps with musical supervision and orchestrations by Rupert Gregson-Williams. The performances were directed by Olivier Py, choreographed by

Andy Blankenbuehler, and is designed and costume designed by Gregg Barnes, Andrew O'Connor, and Katrina Lindsay. Sidi Larbi Cherkaoui is the scenic director. Reception Reviewing the BBC Television version, Dan Wootton of The Guardian wrote: "The London Palladium likes to think of itself as the home of classic musicals, yet it has never shown Les Misérables. [...] A big question is whether this version can stand up to the power and stature of the original production. But my overriding response is not to worry about "can it" – but can it not?" References External links
