For the first time, Russian President Vladimir Putin has publicly set out his vision for the country's military spending in the post-Soviet world. Addressing the Federal Assembly on Monday, Putin said the country would maintain its high defence spending despite losing its superpower status due to the decline of the Russian economy. "We need to be able to deploy an effective military force, and for this, we will not be counting on export," Putin said. "Our main priorities are defence, civil security and national security," he said. "The main index will be the capability of combat troops to deploy wherever necessary and whenever necessary", he said. Putin also criticised the US for shifting its military focus to Asia and for erecting new military bases. Related: China's military spending to top $200bn by 2020 He dismissed a recent US defence spending blueprint as hopelessly inadequate, but said that he would never fully withdraw troops from European soil. "We are ready to review this document," he said. "I can tell you that the majority of our soldiers will be withdrawn from European soil". Russia has traditionally had a more modest military budget than NATO members, but Putin has pledged not to cut back on defence spending, saying that it has been reduced by 70 percent on the "politically motivated" US initiative. "We are ready to increase defence spending to make it equal to the defence spending of the US or even surpass it," he said. [AFP]1.
