Water accumulation is a common problem in concrete structures and is a particularly acute problem when the concrete structure is located in an environment where water is present. Water accumulation in a concrete structure can occur as a result of one or more of: an accumulation of residual moisture (water) within the concrete structure (accreted moisture), a reduction in the ability of the concrete structure to allow water vapor (transpiration) to escape, an accumulation of salts within the concrete structure (salinity accretion) or other types of water accumulation. In some circumstances, a high concentration of moisture within concrete structures is the result of attempting to drain water away from the concrete structure.
