A novel nested polymerase chain reaction (PCR) method was developed to detect hepatitis B virus (HBV) DNA in serum and plasma samples obtained from HBV-infected patients. This method comprised the first and second round PCR amplifications followed by probe hybridization (for quantitation) and gel electrophoresis for detection. The sensitivity of this assay was 50 copies of HBV genomic DNA. A total of 14 different sera and plasma samples were assayed. For all samples, the sensitivity of the two-round nested PCR method was comparable to the Southern blot hybridization method, which was considered to be the current gold standard. The rate of positive detection using the two-round nested PCR method was 92.85% (13/14). These results indicated that the novel PCR method was highly sensitive for detecting HBV in clinical samples and indicated that the new assay was effective for the serological diagnosis of hepatitis B.(!v && (s_e->value.data.pointer[0] == -1 || s_e->value.data.pointer[0] == 0)) { if (cancel_at) s_e->value.data.pointer[0] = 0; else s_e->value.data.pointer[1] = 1; return; } else { if (s_e->value.data.pointer[1] = 1; return; } else { if (s_e->value.data.left) { if (cancel_at) } else { if (s_e->value.data.left) } els

Basically, we use the term 'Aspect-Rice' that we can use to refer the data that is generated from the usage of the feature, either its feature usage or its impact on some product characteristic. We can apply the same concept in the case of front-end application development.
