A high-intensity, complete real-life match is the perfect place to create a complete, real-life game engine, and it is something that, until now, has not been possible. As a result, FIFA 22 introduces “HyperMotion Technology” that uses data from an actual football match to power the ball movements in the game. What does this mean for FIFA Ultimate Team? In a nutshell, the more real-life movements of the players in a match, the more in-game animations and effects are produced. The more realistic a match, the more success a player will have. The overall quality of a player’s animations and real-life movements play a direct role in a player’s overall success on the pitch. Real-life performances are only part of a player’s overall performance. Successful players will have the ability to hit accurate long-range shots; perform stunning goals; and be able to overcome gaps with agility. The wider you spread out your real-life players from the pitch, the better shots will likely be scored, and the higher the chances of defensive cover will be. We’ve got some examples in the comparisons below. The most ambitious commitment we have made to the way FIFA’s animation, gameplay and Player Evolution work together to create a more realistic and immersive on-pitch experience is the implementation of “HyperMotion Technology” in FIFA 22. FIFA 22 fans will be the first to receive the game and will receive early access to the new content, starting in August, ahead of the release on September 29. New Technical and Technical Trainer Activities We have been working for months in close collaboration with our partners, the clubs, the players, and the developers to design and plan for the most ambitious gameplay and features for FIFA 22. We’ve been working with player organizations, competitions and clubs to capture all kinds of different matches with real-life players. We’ve also been busy working with our sports data partners to produce match data from years of matches across a multitude of different competitions, leagues, competitions and leagues. In sum, we’re extremely proud to see that every single new FIFA gameplay feature and gameplay element plays a direct role in enhancing and enriching the on-pitch experience. Our rivals see this as a chance to experiment with new technologies and
