When a player makes a run, dribbles, shoots, or dashes to make a pass, the game's technology captures this movement data and sends the information to a processing system. This system then leverages the data to power every single on-screen action. In preparation for the launch of FIFA 22, EA invited fans to join in on this motion capture session at the EA SPORTS™ FIFA World Cup™ Fan Event this week. Below are some of the highlights of the session and a quick look at how the data from the motion capture will power the gameplay in FIFA 22.

Bio as Player Each player's bio has been made even more accurate with a focus on how the individual player moves, what they like and dislike, and how they use the ball when they have it in certain situations. In FIFA 20, the top-rated players in the world would use their intelligence to dictate the pace of the match and would manage the game like a true General Manager, but this season the game has been re-written to use some of the player's moves and traits to inform the action on the pitch. This year, FIFA 22 will have a focus on real-life players' unique traits and more individual tiki-taka action. Players will have more creative options using the ball. The best players in the world will be closely integrated into the game's personality.

Improving Players' Feel This season the game will make enhancements to player movement and physics to improve the way players move around the pitch. Players will be able to drift off-balance, deflect the ball or hold on to the ball better. Players will also be able to store the ball and recover the ball for more shots. This season, players will feel more connected to the ball and the ball will connect to players more naturally, making them seem more dynamic and natural.

Improved Player Intelligence The intelligence level of players on the pitch will be increased and they will react quicker to different situations, making it easier for players to drive the action, dictate the pace, and control the match. Players will react more intelligently to their teammates, the ball and their opponents as players will feel more connected to the ball and each other, increasing the intensity of the matches.

Enriched Opponent Intelligence Improved AI technology will make the hardest opponents in the world more intelligent and challenging by
