Editor's note: a previous version of this story reported $23 million was to be paid to BC Hydro, but that was later confirmed to be $28.85 million. B.C. Hydro is to receive over $4 million from Quebec's arm's-length hydropower company, which requires the province to compensate for power lost when the Montreal-based Petit Saguenay hydropower project is built, according to an agreement among the three governments. During the first five years of operation, the two-phase project will generate 176 megawatts, or more than a quarter of the 450 megawatts of electricity used by the Chibougamau tourist town in Quebec's Saguenay region, according to the agreement, which was reached this week. The Petit Saguenay hydropower project will produce 176 megawatts of electricity, which will be imported by Quebec's Hydro-Québec, and sold to BC Hydro. (Energy East/Facebook) In return, the $400-million project will lose out on the revenues from the sale of electricity to Hydro-Québec, but Quebec will lose out on its portion of the revenue if it exceeds $4 million in the first year of operation, $8.5 million for the second year, and $14 million for each year after. BC Hydro spokeswoman Michèle Marchand said revenue earned from the hydroelectric project will be reinvested into renewable energy projects. "Under the agreement, Hydro-Québec will pay $28,850,000 to BC Hydro over the first five years for the loss of revenue related to export of hydro-electricity," she said in a written statement. The agreement is "a win-win for the region," said Energy East's president and CEO Ian Anderson. "Quebec gets renewable energy, they get to get an economic advantage to have their electricity available sooner, they get a commitment from BC Hydro to develop green energy projects," he said. The project entails the construction of a 10-megawatt generating station in Saguenay, creating about 100 jobs over the 3a67dffec
