Although there is a large amount of research on how warming affects single trophic levels of a food web, less is known about the responses of food web structure and functioning as a whole. In this study, we use an individual-based mathematical model to examine how food web structure and the response of prey population dynamics to warming are influenced by the size of top predators and how this is related to changes in resource use efficiency, which is defined as the fraction of a consumer's intake that is recycled. We find that prey populations dominate warming responses of food webs, and that these responses change with predator size. The warming response increases with predator size; the response becomes more pronounced as predator size increases. The response of food webs to warming is strongest when predators are small. Accordingly, warming is less likely to affect food web structure when predators are small; it is less likely to affect prey populations when predators are large. Due to
