Lactoferrin-mediated inhibition of hepatitis B virus replication in vitro. Lactoferrin (LF) inhibits in vitro replication of a wide range of enveloped viruses. We showed previously that LF inhibited hepatitis B virus (HBV) DNA synthesis and transcription in vitro. In this report, we studied the mechanism of LF-mediated inhibition of HBV replication in vitro. We found that LF did not inhibit HBV polymerase activity, but inhibited HBV replication by arresting HBV DNA synthesis in the late S phase in a dose-dependent manner. LF treatment did not stimulate the activity of p53 or p38 MAPK. In contrast, the JNK and ERK pathway were activated in a dose-dependent manner by LF treatment. Moreover, the activation of p53 and p38 MAPK and inhibition of ERK and JNK by blocking agents significantly inhibited LF-mediated inhibition of HBV DNA synthesis. These results suggest that the activation of p53 and p38 MAPK by LF treatment may play an important role in HBV inhibition by LF in vitro. The X-ray microprobe: a review. The X-ray microprobe (XMP) is a unique microanalytical device which combines the ability to map the topography of a heterogeneous sample with atom probe, quick chemical derivatization and solid-state manipulation of the sample. Since its introduction, the XMP has been applied to the investigation of a range of materials, most importantly to biological specimens. Here the XMP is reviewed in detail, together with some general information on the chemical and physical aspects of X-rays and the necessary sample preparation techniques. Specimens studied include biological specimens (bony fishes and vertebrate embryos), and materials: (i) homogeneous (carbons, metamorphic rocks), (ii) crystalline (silica and alumina), (iii) heterogeneous (asbestos, coal, wood, tires). Within each case, the microprobe-related aspects of the analysis are described; then the data are compared with the results of other analytical techniques. In addition, some general chemical aspects of the use of the XMP, compared with other characterization techniques, are considered. The Great Recession of 2007 to 2009 has left an estimated 100 million Americans without a job. In many cases, those affected by the Great Recession have moved to poorer states. The effect of the recession on employment can be seen in all 50 states, but the states that were worst affected
