In United States copyright law, fair use of copyrighted works is an important exception to the exclusive right of copyright. Copyright law says that if you use a copyrighted work for any purposes, with or without payment to the copyright holder, you must first get permission from the copyright holder. Such permission can be obtained by sending an e-mail to the copyright holder. Such use is called permitted use. If permission is not received, the use is called infringement. Permitted use does not require to get permission from the copyright holder. Some commercial search engines provide a web interface for you to submit a web site for manual examination by the copyright holder. Such interfaces usually provide a chance to verify the copyright status of the web site, although all the status can not be checked accurately. In the case of the status is correct, you will be notified by the copyright holder. Such status examination is performed manually, and only one notification for each web site will be sent. Some of such interfaces provide a mechanism for users to indicate their interest to get notification of the status of all the web sites they have visited. Some web sites allow you to do a search on particular query and filter the search results by showing those that are copyright-free. This is achieved by checking the per-cited multimedia content and in some cases by checking the certificate, public key and hash, that is found on the internet domain name registrar website.
