What's new:

There are a few reasons why I haven't followed the ASL sky-maps with much interest lately. First, I recently started working as a field assistant at Kitt Peak National Observatory in the summer of 2012. During the 2 year program, we do not run our own facilities. We work with other National and State funded facilities run by other government agencies or private institutions. It is a very intimate working experience with the field staff for all the astronomers on a weekly basis. It is really great to see the persons doing the jobs you're going to do in the future and their approach in the workplace. This is also a profession with a lot of substance to it: you have to get up and out in the wilderness to protect rare objects from wandering little kids or to look for the next class of transient variable stars. But the thing that I enjoy the most about being at Kitt Peak is the understanding my field has on equipment and observing techniques. The gaps in the checklist that I hadn't even realized were missing. On every single evening I get to see a spectacular piece of equipment in action. Tonight I even got to double check the list of equipment my supervisor is giving me tomorrow for my own field setup. The ubiquity of access to amazing gear makes the journey to the telescope an even better experience. Which brings me to the second reason: Open Vizier and Crowdsourcing! I recently downloaded the new version of the Open Vizier application, with the goal of using it in my spare time for capturing data: I stumbled on a nice dataset the SAO Palomar Sky Survey (POSS). I decided to mount the GIRAFFE (GMOS) on my telescope and scan the skies north of the galactic plane using the Sloan Digital Sky Survey (SDSS) filter set. The results will be posted on the Vizier repository for all the NSO/German OAO ESO staff to use. Recently I also used the device to capture the Small Magellanic Cloud (SMC) using the blue channel of the FOV with the SDSS filter set. It was very intuitive to process the data using the existing images of the two galaxies and BOSS - the 'big data' survey run on the SDSS telescope at Apache Point in the northern hemisphere. But what I like best is the DAO-system used to control the camera. For this I have to thank Stefano Portinari. He suggested the use of a
