Field of the Invention This invention generally relates to an electronic imaging device and, more particularly, to a lens alignment device, an image sensor module, and a method of aligning a lens with an image sensor in an electronic imaging device. 2. Description of the Related Art In an electronic imaging device, an image sensor is used to collect light that passes through an object such as a logo and focus it onto an image plane. The image sensor may include a complementary metal oxide semiconductor (CMOS) chip. The light collected by the image sensor is converted into an electrical signal. The electrical signal may be processed to form a digital representation of the image. The digital representation of the image may be transferred to the image plane, such as a film or a printing device, to assist in the printing process. The image sensor may include a rectangular or square array of individual pixels. Each pixel in the array of pixels comprises a light sensitive material or element. The light sensitive element is capable of absorbing light and converting it into an electrical signal. The individual pixels are used to collect light that passes through the object, and convert the light into an electrical signal. Light that is not absorbed by the light sensitive element is not converted into an electrical signal. Typically, the pixels in the array of pixels are arranged in a rectangular array and are separated by metal lines. The metal lines are used to interconnect the pixels to other electronic devices in the electronic imaging device. The metal lines may be arranged in a serpentine pattern. The serpentine pattern may be difficult to lithographically print on a metal line. Therefore, the pattern of interconnect metal lines for the image sensor may be limited in size, and spacing. An image sensor having a small, and closely packed array of pixels may have a lower resolution and poorer quality images than an image sensor that has a larger array of pixels. In addition, light incident to the pixels that is reflected and scattered by defects or imperfections in the metal lines and/or the metal layer may appear in the images produced by the image sensor. Therefore, the quality of the images produced by the
