Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to wear resistant diamond and a method for fabricating the same and more particularly to a wear resistant cubic boron nitride comprising a cubic boron nitride monocrystal or polycrystalline structure in which only a selected portion of the boron nitride grain is converted into cubic boron nitride. 2. Description of the Prior Art Various methods of fabricating a cubic boron nitride monocrystal or polycrystalline structure are already known. When a metal material is placed on a cubic boron nitride material, a method is generally used in which the cubic boron nitride material or powder, a mixed powder of the cubic boron nitride powder and a metal powder, and a cubic boron nitride material infiltrated with a metal sintered body are employed. However, in the case where such a method is used, since a metal that is to be sintered is formed as a solid solution when the metal material infiltrates the cubic boron nitride material, the metal infiltrated into the cubic boron nitride material is distributed as the reaction product in the form of a metal nitride (binder metal) within the cubic boron nitride material as the raw material. As a result, a reaction product film may remain within the polished surface after polishing, or abrasive grains of grinding material may remain in an abrasive grain formed by crushing the abrasive material into a powder,
