Rating 5 stars, based on 1,063 reviews31 May 2006 on the fly adventures The last night of the symposium I attended, we had an apple-sauce fight. I didn't remember the event and arrived only to find a food fight. No one seemed to notice, or care. Four or five people were having a food fight in the main exhibition area. I looked around for what had triggered it. A couple of drunk girls had started making out and somebody said something. Then three or four of them were hugging each other, each hugging their opponent, kissing, biting and pulling hair. People were yelling and someone ripped off someone else's T-shirt. I looked at the people who were in the fight and realized I knew three of them. After the third round, the one person who was still standing started talking to me. I was shocked, he seemed the sort of person who would never talk to someone at a conference. His name was Ryan. He was very attractive, with a taut brown body and a skin-bronzer beard. "You're the guy who's been 'talking' to everyone here," he said to me, smiling. "Are you going to come over here and see what's going on, too?" He was right. I stepped into the fight and someone punched me. I landed on a chair, banging my head on the stage. I tried to get up and find Ryan, but the crowd kept moving. I made it to him and was on my feet, trying to catch my breath, when someone else hit me in the face. "You're bleeding," someone said, pulling my T-shirt off. I looked up to see a hand holding a penny. I'd been hit with a penny. It must have been a bludger, that was the only way that explained it. I hadn't seen any bludgers at the event so far. Ryan took my arm and we walked towards the bar. When we got there, a girl with dark hair was sitting on a chair in the corner. She had a long nose and was crying. "My boyfriend broke up with me," she said. I recognized her; her name was Clara. "He's a liar. He said he loved me, but he used me for my money. He even said I should give up my car, because I should be more concerned about saving the world than about
