To describe and characterize the risk of spontaneous posterior urethral valves (SPUV) in girls with idiopathic neurogenic bladder and/or megaureter. Patient records were reviewed from three institutions. Spontaneous posterior urethral valves were defined as having no antecedent surgical procedure or trauma, and as diagnosed by voiding cystourethrography, ultrasound, or magnetic resonance imaging. The data was analyzed with Fisher's exact test. Cases of idiopathic neurogenic bladder with or without megaureter were analyzed, including three patients with bladder rupture. In this series, 94 girls with idiopathic neurogenic bladder/megaureter underwent a total of 690 procedures (mean, 1.9; range, 1-6). A total of 44 females had unilateral megaureter (range, 1-15). Of these patients, 25 had neurogenic bladder. Three girls presented with bladder rupture and were excluded from analyses. In the remaining group of 41 girls, there was no evidence of SPUV. Girls with idiopathic neurogenic bladder/megaureter have an extremely low risk of SPUV. Since these valves are thought to be always associated with vesicoureteral reflux, girls with idiopathic neurogenic bladder/megaureter may be well managed by observation and prophylactic renal re-implantation. Girls with bladder rupture may benefit from surgical repair.This week we'
