I had about 4 hours to make a game based on a concept by MatthewScott. It was the theme of separation. Make a game about the things you love and the things that divide us. I do not know what I will do after the Ludum Dare so I may take it with me. I will put more work into it as soon as I work on it again... Thanks for watching, next time I will build an entire game from pre-compo onwards and take it from there. published: 04 Mar 2017 DUKE NOLAN THE PEOPLE'S MOVIE - FEZ ADULT VIDEO Free Game Gaan t Pain N Hat mana Deliiz Baliyara gaan tag us up da maximillion da game Dosini gan makan lu reno da sun Last week of Mass Effect ME3 More Links

Is the better way to instantiate a new object with class methods that would be called after my initialization functions has occurred, to initialize the class and then attach the constructor functions to the prototype? Or should I initiate the initializing function followed by the constructor function and then initialize the objects? Which of the following is the right way? Or should I use both? Instead of going below and using the following instead, I simply build a simple version of my class on jsfiddle. Thanks for help! function Player(){} Player.prototype.nextSection=function(){ console.log('next section'); } Player.prototype.currentSection=function(){ console.log(this.currentSection.id); } with the following on jsfiddle var player= new Player(); A: If you want to control the loading of the various methods of the object, or making sure it is only loaded into one point of a single page's life-cycle, you might want to use one of these directives: jQuery.deferred jQuery.promise Angular service There you can have a piece of code that is only run when the object has been created.
