

“The introduction of ‘HyperMotion Technology’ in FUT is a clear indication of the growing importance of motion capture in sports simulation,” said Cristiano Amon, the Executive Producer on the game. “We are always looking for ways to enhance our in-game physics and visual presentation, and this is a fantastic example of the type of gameplay technology we use to deliver the best visual and gameplay experiences possible. We believe the game will be far superior to FIFA 19 in terms of visual and gameplay precision.” FIFA 20 was the first FIFA game to be released with game-changing improvements in overall performance, physics, and animation. FIFA 20 was also the first FIFA game with the player kits and attributes updated to match the real-world, club teams with real players. FIFA 20 also marked the introduction of four new camera views in-game, as well as a new radio broadcast view. The additions combined with a fully reworked system performance, physics and animation code resulted in the game being the most balanced on current generation consoles and PC, and the first FIFA game to receive a perfect 10/10 review score on Metacritic. Powered by EMOBIUS in addition to making significant game-breaking improvements, FIFA 20 also marked the first step in the development of EMOBIUS, EA’s game development technology platform designed to help the development, production and management of the biggest sports franchises the world has ever seen. EMOBIUS is EA’s world-leading development platform that is powering some of the world’s most accomplished game teams. EMOBIUS is already contributing to the success of the FIFA series in a range of ways, including supporting the development of award-winning player movement and animations. It also enables and simulates ball flight in real-time, simulating the aerodynamics and flight of the ball in the real world, as well as adding other new physics effects such as wind and air resistance. Final Thoughts on Player Movement With the introduction of player movement and animations powered by EMOBIUS, the developers have been able to remove more than 100 animations. This allows players to tackle naturally and players are no longer constrained by the ball position. This is how we like to play FIFA. But how does it feel? Below are some short-footage videos that show off the new player movement and animations on the field.
