Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to an electrical junction box and an electrical junction box having a cover, and more particularly to a cover structure for an electrical junction box which prevents a cover from being broken when an external force acts on the cover in a direction perpendicular to a direction of force applied to the cover. 2. Description of the Related Art Electrical junction boxes such as fuse blocks, relay blocks and bus bars are mounted in a vehicle such as an automobile or a motorcycle. Such an electrical junction box has a plurality of electrical connection portions such as electric terminals and connectors and is configured to mount and fix electronic components such as fuses, relays and connectors. The components such as the fuses, relays and connectors are supported on a case of the electrical junction box by a plurality of fixing ribs formed integrally with the case. Accordingly, the components can be mounted on the case in a desired arrangement. In the conventional electrical junction box of the type described above, the fixing ribs protrude outward from an inner surface of the case, and thus, the case is large in size. The problem is that the size of the case increases when the case is mounted on a vehicle. The electrical junction box is fixed to a vehicle body through a mounting bracket. In this regard, the cases of the electrical junction boxes are desirably provided with covers which are formed of synthetic resin and molded so as to be relatively easy to be mounted on the vehicle. The cover is fixed to the vehicle body by the mounting bracket. In addition, the cover serves as a protection cover for the components of the electrical junction box. The protective cover is desirably molded to be relatively easy to be mounted on the vehicle. The
