Lipid oxidation is an important problem in bakery products, and its presence can result in a loss of nutritional quality and off-flavors. This review summarizes the techniques that have been employed in the last few years to control the oxidative processes during storage of bakery products. Some of the strategies reviewed here are related to the main factors that govern the inhibition of oxidation, such as technological and packaging conditions. Other strategies include the modulation of temperature and other processing parameters (e.g., heating/cooling rate), the addition of secondary components (e.g., antioxidants), the use of additives, the thermal treatment, the use of enzymes and synthetic enzyme mimetics, and the metabolic engineering of microorganisms.Q: Is there a way to implement conditional variable access? I have a scenario where I only want to run an event handler against a particular user. I do not want to run the event for all the users. For example, the user A has some event handlers hooked to some events of some objects that are being spawned in the game and hence I want only to run the event handlers related to object A when the user A is playing the game. Is there a way in Katana to implement this? A: Katana doesn't provide any mechanism to do what you want but Katana does provide a mechanism to create and apply event handlers at runtime. If you are creating your own
