Researchers found that toxin concentrations in US homes are linked to a range of health hazards, from emotional conditions to more serious chronic illnesses. "Our data from a nationwide US household survey provide the most comprehensive examination to date of the presence of chemicals that are likely to have an adverse impact on human health in people's homes," says senior author Andy Tobler, professor of sociology at Duke University. "These chemicals can contribute to conditions like depression, asthma, diabetes, and cancer. Exposure to these substances may be more common than previously appreciated." The team studied the levels of 94 chemicals present in up to 1,785 homes. More than a quarter of these chemicals were classified as volatile organic compounds (VOCs), with long-term exposure linked to high blood pressure. Two-thirds of homes had at least one pesticide residue, with even higher levels in homes with only one person. Overall, 87 percent of homes tested contained at least one pesticide residue, and on average, homes contained four. For this analysis, the researchers looked at high-risk

One of the parameters in the request is an array of chars. I need to convert this to a byte array. But as I am not a good C++ coder, I don't know how to convert from QByteArray to a char* using boost asio. Can anyone please help. I have tried using toString QByteArray foo =...; char* buf = new char[foo.size() * sizeof(char)]; foo.copy(buf,foo.size()); this returns a random length of memory. It's a waste. I have also tried this: QByteArray foo =...; char* buf = new char[foo.size()]; foo.copy(&buf, foo.size()); This returns a shorter length of memory than the previous code. This is the function which gets the response from the proxy server: void Client::doWork(QByteArray arInData) { request(); char buf = new char[arInData->size()]; buf = arInData->toAscii(); } A: If you are trying to convert from a QByteArray to a char* then you should use toAscii() instead of copying (which is what the operator== is for). That should get you a char* buffer of the appropriate size. If you have a C++ 11 compliant compiler you can also just use std::copy(). Q: Create a string from a list of objects I have a class that looks like this: public class Bank { public string AccNumber {get; set;} public string AccountName {get; set;} public int Balance {get; set;} public DateTime DateOfLastPayment {get; set;} public double InterestRate {get; set;} public int PaymentLimit {get
