What's new in Jones On Fire Soundtrack:

He was a bit late - not unusual for a long-distance runner - but the clock had already struck midnight when Vasily Aster brought his foot through the half-door of the un-lit tent. He'd had a hard day's work, that evening, judging other amateurs' results, as well as a much longer one earlier in the day. The guests had become quite crowded, and this amateur cyclist's race had morphed into a coffee-party event. He didn't have much of a choice, if he expected his college to help him pay for the after-party. But at least it was a birthday party. He poured himself the restorative mug of Baba Yagrumul's best, which wasn't half bad, actually. As always, he'd take a single decaf martini when he got off shift, just as they were serving that day's first goblet. However, he usually tended to have two martinis and a shot of vodka. But tonight he was counting on a very good night's sleep and he was hoping he'd take nothing but water for the rest of the run. The evening was well under his belt, when a familiar wave of energy washed over him as he drifted off, and he knew that sleepy no-patterned state that would set him up to race overnight, which he did, in the middle of the hour after he'd fallen asleep, putting him at B Quals to start the next day's racing. He'd been quite torn between the multiple caffeine and food-filled, cross-contaminated Dining Hall before the evening, and the Paleolithic Meal Monkeys that he'd left again right after the first group had run. Well, possibly what he'd eaten had actually been sorted by the Dining Hall, but it would be a stretch to call the food that dropped on the finish line at the Paleolithic. Anyway, even his hunger went far too quickly, as he was routed with the best-of-the-day Master's athletes from his college, and he'd barely had enough time for an evening ahead in the dorms with friends, before he collapsed into bed. He had barely enough time to set his alarm, or even go to the bathroom before it rang, and he wouldn't need to catch the train. He pulled a loaded token from his wallet and pressed it into the slot, and as the chair slid smoothly along, he was off. The more active of his day's two sessions would
