Cpac imaging.The Latest The government shutdown could lead to reduced medical services for seniors because many are paid through Medicare and Medicaid, according to medical professionals and advocates. It also could affect mental health services, which are funded through Medicaid. That's the conclusion of the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO) in its budget analysis of the effects of the partial shutdown in the last week of September. The agency projects that the shutdown will slow the growth of healthcare programs in 2018, and also reduce the budget deficit by $11 billion. It will increase the budget deficit by $61 billion between 2019 and 2028. The agency predicts an 8 percent drop in overall spending for 2018 and next year, compared with a 2 percent increase in 2017. However, in its analysis, the agency states that the budget deficit would likely decline by more than 20 percent if the shutdown continues through early January. The Trump administration said the report didn't reflect the actual effects of the partial shutdown. "The White House's allies who will be briefed on the report are already decrying its analysis as flawed," The New York Times reported. "Moreover, the report strongly suggests that federal workers have suffered as a consequence of the shutdown, for the first time acknowledging that the lapse has hurt roughly 800,000 federal employees." The shutdown has forced 400,000 federal workers to be without pay, and has also impacted Medicare, Medicaid, food stamps and other programs. Services for veterans were also affected when the Department of Veterans Affairs was forced to close. Seniors and those with disabilities have been hardest hit during the shutdown. That's because of cuts to Social Security, Medicare and Medicare Part B, programs that provide benefits to
