Background of Related Art It is known to provide a surgical retractor which is used by a surgeon to hold tissues or organs at a location where they are to be treated during surgical procedures. For example, a vascular retractor is used to hold a blood vessel at a location where the vessel is to be treated during a surgical procedure. The retraction of blood vessels during cardiac surgery is particularly acute, and this problem is exacerbated during coronary bypass surgery in which the surgeon is particularly concerned with the kinking of large blood vessels which might otherwise be used to provide a bypass graft. When using a retractor to hold a blood vessel or other anatomical structure it is also important to know the proper attitude of the surgical retractor in order that the structure does not become crushed. The known vascular retractors are generally formed of sheet metal. It is known to provide a vascular retractor having a retractor blade formed of a series of arcuate filaments interconnected by a retractor plate. In use, the retractor blade is slid over the length of the structure to be held. It is known to provide a vascular retractor which has a retractor blade formed of a series of sinusoidal spring elements or sine blades disposed parallel to one another and interconnected by a retraction plate. The sine blades are disposed to allow the retractor blade to flex along one axis only. It is also known to provide a vascular retractor having a blade formed of a square shaped member having longitudinal sides and transverse sides. The longitudinal sides of the square shaped member are interconnected by a retraction plate. The longitudinal sides of the retractor blade are
