For example, the person can use a dental implant which is inserted into the bone in the alveolar ridge of the person. In some cases, a dental bridge requires a plurality of dental implant-supported abutments to connect the pontic to the dental prosthesis. The abutments can be welded to the dental implant to enable the dental prosthesis to be secured in place. An example of a dental bridge secured to a dental implant by welding can be found in U.S. Pat. No. 5,246,005 (Stubblefield) assigned to the assignee of the present invention. The above-mentioned dental implant with the welded abutments is typically called a surgical type implant. In the case of a socalled nonsurgical type dental implant, a large hole is drilled in the bone, and a dental implant with an abutment mounted to the implant is inserted into the bone. If necessary, a healing cap is also attached to the implant before the abutment is welded to the implant. An example of a healing cap with a healing abutment can be found in U.S. Pat. No. 5,071,436 (Stubblefield et al.) The above-mentioned references are incorporated herein by reference. If there is too great a force in the wrong direction on the tooth and implant at the time of the welding, the weld may break away and/or the implant and abutment may break away from the dental implant. If a dental bridge is formed around the implant, the loss of the implant and the abutment can disrupt the dental bridge. 2 Levels 5-9 (New) SimCity is about bringing back the joys and challenges of civilization.
