Impact of dihydropyridine and nondihydropyridine calcium channel blockers on left ventricular function: a comparison of left ventricular pressure-volume relations and dobutamine stress echocardiography. Calcium channel blockers (CCBs) have demonstrated a beneficial influence on left ventricular (LV) remodeling in experimental models. However, CCB effects on LV function in humans have been conflicting and are not well known. The aim of this study was to compare the impact of dihydropyridines (DHP) and nondihydropyridines (NDHP) CCBs on LV function using a combination of the pressure-volume (PV) relation and dobutamine stress echocardiography (DSE) in patients with coronary artery disease (CAD). Two hundred fifty-one consecutive patients with CAD were studied prospectively at rest and during maximal incremental infusion of dobutamine. PV relations were derived at rest and during increasing doses of dobutamine. All patients received at least 1 CCB and were randomly divided into 2 groups according to type of CCB: DHP group (n = 150) and NDHP group (n = 101). Patients in both groups showed similar demographic characteristics. At baseline and maximal dobutamine infusion, mean LV end-diastolic pressure (LVEDP) was not different between groups (18+/-7.2 mm Hg in DHP group vs. 20+/-8.1 mm Hg in NDHP group). In addition, CCB nonresponsiveness was not significantly different in both groups (9/150 patients in DHP group vs. 20/101 patients in NDHP group). When LVEDP was evaluated by the regression line of LVEDP versus cardiac index, CCB responders showed a significant steeper regression slope compared with CCB nonresponders in both groups (P 6d1f23a050
