Submillijoule infrared free-electron lasers operating on a near-diffraction-limited basis have opened up new areas of laser physics. They provide extremely shortpulse power. In addition, they allow the use of ultrastable optical elements and rapid, switchable phase modulators, both of which aid in the realization of stable high-resolution imaging and spectroscopy at extremely high repetition rates. In this paper, we report the first experimental proof that it is possible to extend femtosecond laser physics to the infrared, and in particular, the infrared-free-electron-laser range. We demonstrate absorption modulation of infrared quasiparticles emitted by a CO(2) laser in a liquid-nitrogencooled Yb:YAG crystal. Our laser source allows us to modulate the infrared radiation over a range from 6 to 25 µm with, for the shortest pulses, up to 15% contrast ratio. Such modulation leads to a complementary use of a CO(2) laser and an infrared femtosecond laser, and may be useful in the development of new spatially resolved optical spectroscopy techniques. Each of the acts you'll see in this special, three-hour block includes a story, a song, and a dance. The story is about a woman who travels to France to visit her best friend, the princess, who is heartbroken because she has been promised to another. When Lola intervenes, she watches as Lola learns the 6d1f23a050
