as erythropoietin (EPO) and erythropoietin-producing cell kinase (EPO-1). The mammalian protein erythropoietin (EPO) controls the production of red blood cells and has also been implicated in the proliferation of neurons and in the differentiation and apoptosis of hemopoietic cells (Borg, N., et al. (1992) Ann. Rev. Med. 43:899-917). The gene encoding EPO has been cloned and sequenced from human and murine cDNA and EPO from various mammalian species has been functionally characterized (Lin, H., et al. (1989) Proc. Natl. Acad. Sci. USA 86:1434-1438; Bunn, G., et al. (1990) J. Biol. Chem. 265:8884-8889; Igarishi, S., et al. (1992) J. Biol. Chem. 267:2230-2237; Dahle, O., et al. (1993) Cell 75:1093-1099; Aladjalova, A., et al. (1994) J. Biol. Chem. 269:25126-25132). The biological actions of EPO have been demonstrated to be mediated through a specific EPO receptor (EPOR), which is expressed on the surface of erythroid progenitor cells (Borg, N., et al. (1988) Nature 336:717-719). The human EPO gene is composed of four exons and three introns spanning at least 80 kilobases (Kb). The EPO cDNA is 2.0 Kb in length and contains two short untranslated regions, 5' and 3'-UTRs, and a long open reading frame. The predicted amino acid sequence of human EPO shares 52% homology with the amino acid sequence of murine EPO 6d1f23a050
