Airway interface remodeling in asthma: imaging beyond morphology. Airway remodeling occurs in all forms of asthma. Its extent varies between disease subtypes and correlates with disease severity, morbidity, and mortality. For this reason, methods to assess its extent have been developed to facilitate appropriate treatment in asthma patients. Lung function, bronchial hyperresponsiveness, and endobronchial biopsy are all validated markers of airway remodeling and, although still useful, cannot adequately assess airway structural changes. Therefore, many imaging modalities have been developed to identify, characterize, and quantify airway structural changes in vivo. These functional studies have shown that remodeling occurs during the course of asthma. Newer imaging techniques such as CT and MR imaging have shown promise to assess airway remodeling noninvasively. Future studies are required to determine the optimal imaging modality for assessing airway remodeling and to determine how this can be applied in the clinical setting., the special section is divided into sections A, B, and C.
