Since the end of May, many major torrent sites including ExtraTorrent, KickAss Torrents, Demonoid, etc., has been under siege by various law enforcement agencies, mostly the entertainment industry as the largest ones were under ownership of major record labels and movie studios. The reason behind this is for alleged copyright infringements. And the people behind the numerous torrent sites are not angels in their behavior. In fact, kick ass torrents and ExtraTorrent have faced many lawsuits in the past for not promptly removing copyrighted content. But they're not innocent either. After all, torrent sites are a common site which reduces the number of such postings available to file sharers, and the torrent sites themselves do not have any rules and regulations to follow. However, the issue goes beyond the sites that are now closed. In fact, the threat to torrents is a global one. Governments are working hard and even using advanced surveillance methods to track down and shut down torrent websites on a global scale. Interestingly, this attitude appears to have moved from tools such as ISP's blocking of torrent traffic and now online sites. This means that not only sites with massive sets of torrents, like KickAss Torrents and ExtraTorrent, can be shut down but also smaller sites which contain less content can get caught in the web as well. It's with this background that we bring to you what might be the fate of the largest torrent site. The following piece is based on the article written by TorrentFreak.com and discusses an interesting story related to the shutdown of KickAss torrents. Ironically, as we mentioned above, ExtraTorrent.cc was following a similar course as KickAss Torrents, and so it was inevitable for it to be shut down. So, we went with the article to read it out and bring you the most interesting details and developments pertaining to ExtraTorrent. It seems that it was just a matter of time before it was shut down.
