this article examines the activities of a number of geographic entities (regions, states, provinces, cities, municipalities, and so on) and the political process through which these entities are formed. it illustrates how the process has been fundamentally influenced by the course of a project (the charter of the united nations) and the competing interests of the major powers involved. its author argues that it will be important for scholars of international relations to take a more nuanced and sophisticated view of the role of geography in determining the nature of power in the contemporary international system, and specifically the role of geography in shaping the geopolitical outcomes of global processes. this is true of a wide variety of political phenomena, ranging from international conflict, to the location of international institutions, and the distribution of global income and wealth. this study examines the role of geography in determining the nature and distribution of political power in latin america. its main aim is to provide a framework for understanding the interaction between geography and the structural processes that give rise to persistent patterns of political development. it examines the role of a number of geographic variables in the formation of political institutions and distribution of power in latin america, using a dataset from the world values survey and the latinobarometer panel, two global surveys that produce data on countries on a number of dimensions of political life, including the role of geography in determining the nature and distribution of political power. it demonstrates the importance of geography in the institutionalization of political power and how patterns of political development are influenced by geography in a number of ways. it also offers suggestions for future research. in particular, the article argues that, while political geography has been the focus of attention in the study of regional political development, regional economic development should also be examined. it also argues that we need to look at the role of geography in shaping and determining the nature and distribution of political power in the global context.
