The story, of a seemingly average kid who takes up a sport to regain some self esteem, and who finds that his newfound power actually has some real positive value in the real world, is realistic and appealing, and has come to life as an enjoyable experience. The acting is terrific, with Chris Siverston playing Kick-Ass as if hes playing a real person, not a cartoon. The screenplay by Matthew Vaughn is nicely balanced, showing the hero struggle, and coming into his own, with enough internal conflict to make you care about how the story progresses. At one level, the whole thing is a satire of the superhero genre, with a superhero who doesnt always turn out to be the hero people expect, with a number of touches reminding you why we like our superheroes in the first place. Once Kick-Ass and his crew make it their habit to take on the villains from the imaginary comic books they read, it is clear that its only a matter of time before the bad guys send in a killer who really knows how to use a knife. Their world is similar to ours, with gangs and drug dealers, but there are real heroes around to help people. When Kick-Ass is arrested after attacking a criminal and a cop, he decides to use this to promote the idea of superheroes being real, not the stuff of fiction. Kick-Ass co-writer John Romita, Jr adds depth to his character with the addition of scenes dealing with his father, and the scenes on the side of the criminals, although the whole world we enter in Kick-Ass is slightly less believable than the goodie-two-shoes world of the comics. Nevertheless, this makes for a captivating and rich film, which finally combines the best parts of the comics, the TV series, and the movies, and puts everything into one well paced fun package.

connection (rules changed recently) are required to pay for it (it is a public service station), it should be a requirement that they offer solutions that works for everyone. the problem is that there really isn't any good open source solutions available currently. posted dec 9, 2006 11:43 utc (sat) by philip e. merriam (subscriber, #17221) [link] 5ec8ef588b
