The local structure of water is seen to reflect its bulk properties, in particular, the dynamic properties as shown by recent molecular dynamics simulations. However, the relationship between local structure and global properties of liquid water, in particular, the density, has not been quantified. Here, we employ the radial distribution function in a local density approximation to construct a simple phenomenological model that quantitatively relates the local structural properties to the global properties of liquid water. We show that the model can reproduce the observed behavior of the properties of liquid water over a large temperature range and over several orders of magnitude of density with a single set of parameters. The model gives insight to the origin of the structural anomalies of water, and suggests a simple phenomenological approach for the prediction of the properties of liquid water. Theta-gamma-L-epsilon triple-labelled immunolabelling to assess the origin of muscarinic afferents in the subnucleus gelatinosus of the rat. The subnucleus gelatinosus (SG) of the spinal trigeminal nucleus is innervated by cholinergic fibres from the primary somatosensory cortex and, like other regions of the spinal trigeminal nucleus, receives afferents from a variety of brainstem areas. This study set out to investigate the origin of primary afferents in the rat SG with the use of a triple-labelling method. Cholinergic fibres were labelled using a novel rabbit polyclonal antiserum raised against carbachol and the terminal label revealed by the use of an alkaline phosphatase anti-alkaline phosphatase (APAAP) technique. The neuronal population was subdivided into three separate groups (labelled from cortex, rhombencephalic reticular formation and pontine nuclei) by employing a double-labelling technique with a combination of a monoclonal antibody and the APAAP method 2edc1e01e8
