In order to minimize the required communication bandwidth I'm using the __restrict__ keyword to ensure that each MPI process only accesses its own local memory (__restrict__ for C++98, __restrict__ for C++11). As a result of this restriction each MPI process can only work with pointers to fixed blocks of memory of size 16 bytes. This means that if the pointer to a variable is not aligned on a multiple of 16 bytes, the process will fail to return the value of the variable. So I was wondering what is the best way to force C++ to use different memory alignment, instead of 16. Obviously it is not possible in C++, but how can I make C++ use a different alignment? A: Use an aligned allocator for the purpose. As you noted, it is not possible to instruct the C++ standard library to always deallocate objects with a different alignment than the one requested. import os import sys import os.path import vtk srcDir = '/petsc/petsc-tests/data' outDir = os.path.join(os.path.ab

Is it possible to create a constructor function in typescript? I would like to use it like this: function TestClass() {} TestClass.prototype.method1 = function () {...} TestClass.prototype.method2 = function () {...} A: In ES5, you'd do the following: function TestClass() { this.method1 = function () {...}; this.method2 = function () {...}; } In ES2015+, you do the following: class TestClass { constructor() { this.method1 = function() {...}; this.method2 = function() {...}; } } Typing this.method1() should result in an error, unless you add the keyword this (04aeff104c
